

Sacre Noir

UK release date:
13th May 2012

A bass / synth driven track with gritty guitar sounds, 'She Can't Take It' is a catchy slice of electro-pop, that grabs your attention at the intro.

After a great show in Goldman's Bar (Berlin) on a very cold night in December 2011, one lovely and lively Londoner declared after the gig, "you've got to do a video for that track" She was clearly a creative type finding it hard to leave her work at home in Brick Lane, but was totally convinced that a video was a good move. Sold on the idea, we decided to go for it - and we are very glad that we did!

Thank you for the inspiration, our London friend.

single and video release

After some great responses to the live shows in Paris, London, Berlin and Edinburgh in 2011, it was decided that 'She Can't Take It' would be the first single released from the forthcoming 2nd album by Sacre Noir. Staying true to the haunting, lo-fi atmospheric sounds now synonymous with Sacre Noir, this single manages to capture the live style too & draws on more up-beat influences than those found on the debut album 'Her Volatile Condition'.

Finding the right film-maker turned out to be a bigger task than necessary. After a few months of searching & talking to potential collaborators, we realised that the answer was on our doorstep all along.

When you're at school it's always someone's big brother that sorts stuff out, but now we're in long trousers it's the turn of little brothers to come to the rescue...

Introducing David Sodergren from Boshpit Productions. After an initial chat we knew this could be a great match of creative ideas and one month later the first Sacre Noir video shoot took place - with help from some very good friends, local talent & businesses. Combining a common love of David Lynch proved to be a winning link, as the video realises the lyrical themes & musical darkness.
