After some great responses to the live shows in Paris, London, Berlin and Edinburgh in 2011, the 2nd album by Sacre Noir is unleashed.

Sacre Noir are releasing their 2nd full length album on Savage Recordings (UK), on the 23rd July 2012. 'Sinking Into Darkness' delivers a more 'live' sound whilst staying true to the lo-fi haunting melodies identified with Sacre Noir. This second album captures the more upbeat influences found in the live show.

"hypnotic sounds which cast an appropriately irresistible spell over the listener"

The cover image for 'Sinking Into Darkness' comes from a photo that the band took of a piece of street art in Berlin (from the Winter Tour of 2011). So in love with the image, the artist Nick Gregson was contacted and generously allowed the photo to be replicated for the album cover. The feeling was that this piece, and Nick's work generally, really sums up the contradictions of darkness and light within the album as a whole.

The ten track album was recorded at Savage Studios in Edinburgh over a period of around two years, with additional material being recorded around Edinburgh, and on tour in Paris, London and Berlin. This helped to capture the raw intensity of the Sacre Noir live show, balanced with the sombre moments of reflection & melancholy.

The first single to be taken from the album 'She Can't Take It' was released in May 2012 along with the band's first music video and has received great reviews so far;

"like blinked snapshot memories of strangely compelling nightmares"

"moody blues that sounds like it's been filtered through transistors, capacitors and other gadgetry"

To promote these new releases Sacre Noir are taking to the road again this summer (August 2012). After successful live shows in Europe during 2011 it was decided the first stops would be Paris & Berlin.
